In the US, the unemployment rate increased to 9.1 percent in July, continuing a long-term downward trend that has resulted in an unemployment rate of just 5.3 percent, the lowest level since February 2008. This shows that the labor market is moving in the right direction. However, the employment to population ratio remains below pre-recession levels. Moreover, the employment to population ratio is below the level required for sustained recovery. Moreover, for most US workers, wage gains have failed to keep pace with labor productivity growth. The tight labor market continues to constrain wage growth, which has averaged only 2.3 percent per year since 2005. This is in contrast to productivity growth of 3.1 percent per year on average over that same period. The result is that the US workforce has become more productive but real hourly wages have declined for most workers since 2005. This raises the question: is there a disconnect between workers' productivity and their wages? Are workers being paid too little to keep up with their productivity? And is the shortfall due to technology, globalization, or a lack of skill and education? Much of the focus has been on employment in high-skill professional occupations. Yet many of the largest US industries have for decades now relied on the services of the least-educated workers. Indeed, the data show that the employment-to-population ratio has been the lowest for the least educated (no high school diploma) since the 1940s. The same pattern is evident across age groups. At the same time, the US has been seeing a steady increase in the share of workers in the lowest occupations, particularly in jobs that require relatively little education. These trends mean that the size of the overall labor market is shifting away from highly skilled workers and towards relatively low-skilled workers. As a result, technological progress has come to depend on the skills and education of the least-educated workers. Yet these workers have faced a labor market in which the tightness of the labor market has constricted wage growth. Hence, they have not been able to benefit from the strong productivity growth of the 2000s. Since most of the rise in US labor productivity in recent years has been in lower-skill occupations, this means that wage growth has been lagging behind productivity. This raises a key question for the future: is there a connection between low wages and low productivity for workers with low skills? Is the productivity of the US workforce and the competitiveness of the US economy tied to the wages of workers with low skills? And
