JAVA 8 helps developers get a boost The Java language and Java 7 have changed a lot since the year 2000. Java 7 was released in October 2011 and was the first release from Oracle since the acquisition of Sun Microsystems. In the following years, Java 7 introduced a wide variety of new features to Java including the use of lambda functions, the invocation of interface methods via reflection, and dynamic class loading. If you want to take advantage of these new features, you'll need to upgrade to Java 8. In this post, we'll discuss how to take advantage of these new features and how Java 8 helps developers.

Lambda Functions

A major innovation introduced by Java 8 is the concept of lambdas. These anonymous functions are commonly used to express code that is concise and functional. The lambdas are generated by the Java compiler when needed. For example, in the following code snippet, lambda expressions are used to create a function that converts numbers from unsigned long to integer. Public Class MainClass { // code to execute private static final int TOTAL_MULTIPLIERS = 25; private static final long MAX_UINT = 1_000_000_000_000_000; public static void main (String[] args) { long i = 0; // generate total number of numbers while (i

Short tutorial WinCycle is a power tool for monitoring and controlling the performance of Windows computers and devices. The application gathers valuable system metrics, such as CPU, RAM, hard drive, and GPU utilization, and lets you activate a flexible set of built-in policies. WinCycle can also run on a remote machine from a local computer. And to help you control everything from a single interface, you can use the built-in scheduler. You can configure rules for all available policies, and then start, pause, and resume their monitoring with a few mouse clicks. Monitoring and control WinCycle provides three main views: Device Health, Audit, and Scheduler. The first one shows you the most important system metrics and lets you determine what is going on with your computer. Additionally, the application can help you identify the cause of system issues. The second view is a summary of all scheduled monitoring and control policies. In other words, the results of all policy rules can be viewed at once. The third view lets you configure policies that you need to monitor and control, based on system-level metrics. Scheduling The built-in scheduler can help you run automatic or scheduled rules without requiring any interaction. You can choose the most suitable schedule and rule types. Then, you can configure the conditions and triggers of all monitored metrics and set up actions to be taken when conditions are met. For the sake of security, WinCycle can also generate an encrypted report. You can specify the report generation period and destination address in order to set the report time and where you want to send it. Anti-malware policy In case you are concerned about virus and malware, you can also create an anti-malware policy.

End-user experience WinCycle can run on a single computer or it can be deployed on
